Wappenbeschreibung.

Rawicz (Rawa, Ursyn, Ursowic, Miedźwiada, Miedźwioda, Niedźwiada, Niedźwiak, Niedźwieda, Niedźwioda, Rawic, Rawita.

In a field of gold a striding, raising its right foot, a black bear, on which, facing forward, sits a maiden, in a blue robe that leaves her neck bare, her arms covered only to the elbows, her arms spread out in familiar directions , hair loose, a golden crown on his head; Helmet decoration: between two deer horns, each with five ends from later authors such as Duncewski, Krasicki, Kuropatnicki, Malachowski, Wieladko and also added their own information. On the outside, a half- rising black bear facing left, holding a red rose in its raised left paw. About the origin of the coat of arms it is said : A king in England left behind a son and a daughter, which he had designated as a dowry instead of treasures. The son who had come into power did not want to lose such great wealth by marrying his sister to one of many foreign suitors and had the sister brought together with a wild, voracious bear in order to get rid of her. However, he did nothing to her, but showed affectionate friendliness towards her, let her stroke him and bridle him with a belt and lead him. She mounted it and rode away to safe havens. When the brother heard about this miracle, the sister asked forgiveness and consented to her marriage to a prince of Lorraine, with whom she had several sons, from whom this coat of arms was bestowed upon request. The descendants of these sons also spread to Bohemia, where they probably called themselves Ursyn after the coat of arms. From this family, Wawrzeniec Lorek, called Bozej, was insulted by the Czech duke Bretyslav, who had expelled his family from the country, and killed him in 1100. When Borzywoj, brother of Bretyslav, came to power, he forgave Bozej and his brother von Mutyna this murder and gave them back the Bozej, Sanz, Mutyna and Lewtomorzyce estates in 1101. But Swiatopelk, having reached the dukedom, had Mutyna and their two sons Bozej and Borszak, and their relatives Unislaw and Domislaw murdered in 1108, which is why their family members, out of concern for their safety, emigrated to Poland, where they were kindly received by King Bolesław Krzywousty and gave them land in Rawa Voivodeship. After this new home, the family and coat of arms were named Rawa, which later became Rawicz. The name Kostrowicz also came up occasionally. This coat of arms is used by:

More descriptions. Rawicz denotes a Polish coat of arms used by various families of Polish nobility () from the time of the .

According to legend, the Rawicz coat of arms is one of the oldest coats of arms of the Szlachta, possibly even the oldest. It first appears as a seal in the 13th century. Until the it was used by about 220 Polish noble families, mostly in the Kraków, Lublin and Sandomierz areas. The Rawitsche were a Masovian tribe of knights, dating back with certainty to the powerful Czech family of by the Bohemian duke around (see:). A member of the family named Goworek fled to Poland, where he was defeated by estates in and . Rawitsche 's original seat in Poland was the town of , which, like Rawitsch, got its name from the family coat of arms. Goworek's grandson, also named Goworek, was of and tutor to Duke . In the 13th century the family split into two lines: von Warschowitze, who descended from Warsz, castellan of Kraków and presumably founding , and von Grotowitze, who also held high offices of state. Both lines were supporters of King in his struggle with of Bohemia. In the second half of the 14th and 15th centuries the Rawitsche came to the greatest power: many of them were castellans, one became a bishop of Kraków. In the 15th century, the Rawitsche also appear in and .
