The importance of sustainable development has been realized for at least 60 years, even though the vast majority of people erroneously think this concept originated with the Brundtland Commission report of 1987 on Our Common Future. In spite of at least six decades of existence, we only have some idea as to what is NOT sustainable development rather than what is. SpringerBriefs on Case Studies of Sustainable Development identify outstanding cases of truly successful sustainable development from different parts of the world and analyze enabling environments in depth to understand why they became so successful. The case studies will come from the works of public sector, private sector and/or civil society. These analyses could be used in other parts of the world with appropriate modifications to account for different prevailing conditions, as well as text books in universities for graduate courses on this topic. The series of short monographs focuses on case studies of sustainable development bridging between environmental responsibility, social cohesion, and economic efficiency. Featuring compact volumes of 50 to 125 pages (approx. 20,000—70,000 words), the series covers a wide range of content—from professional to academic—related to sustainable development. Book Description

This case book is a collection of poverty alleviation cases in China, cross-referencing with cases overseas.

Through analysing the different strategies carried out to address the key specific pain-points at the focal regions and villages, via the effort and collaboration of key stakeholders, the book provides an overview of how Sustainable Development Goals (SDGs) by the United Nations could be achieved. While ‘No Poverty’ is the first goal in the SDGs, the innovative poverty alleviation approaches demonstrated in these cases had tackled more than just one single goal—with solutions towards multiple dimensions of environmental or social issues.

The academic team has carried out further research and analysis based on the solid ground of the International Poverty Reduction Centre in China (IPRCC) cases. The book is structured in two aspects: in the microscopic view, detail of the focal poverty condition and its corresponding solution and impact will be studied; in the macroscopic perspective, it is to identify the insights how the learning could be adopted in other areas with similar condition.

We are very grateful to the IPRCC and Bill & Melinda Gates Foundation for their support to this project.

Evolution from Original Case Reports

The cases are based on the documents from IPRCC. They are well written, informative and have served the reporting purpose on the achievements of the successful poverty alleviation cases of different scenarios in China. These forms the primary data for this case book.
